Q: Anyone know if this fits Pro'sKit ratchet tool, also one hole for crimp, one hole for strip, third hole ?

A: I used the center hole for stripping my 8-9mm MSD wire, and the inner hole for crimping the connector to the wire. My MSD connectors came with instructions not to use a crimp tool on the electrode end, but rather to use needle nose pliers to confine the electrode between the pinch tabs. With older style connectors, the electrode can be folded back over the wire and crimped between the wire insulator and the connector. This die worked very well for me

Very nice tool

These things do a neat and professional job of making custom spark plug wires.. so much better than those flimsy $15 dolar ones and auto parts stores

Works for crimping but does not strip wire

By J. Hadlock on March 23, 2012

Verified Purchase

I bought these jaws to give my ratcheting crimping pliers the ability to aid in making some custom spark plug wires. The portion of the jaws that crimps the connector is fine. It took a couple of wires to perfect "the art" of it but I got the hang of it fairly quickly. They produce the perfect crimp needed for the terminal connectors. The area in which they are a let down is that the cutting teeth that are supposed to help strip the wire but not damage the core. For starters they are sharp enough to cut through anything. Second, even when fully crimped there is a gap where the jaw's edges should meet. I ended up using a razor blade and steady hand to cut and strip the wires. There are stand-alone tools out there that aid in stripping spark plug wires. If you are going to be doing several sets of wires it would probably be a worth while investment.
